

10/25/25 Former NFL wide receiver dies at 87, just like everyone else DENVER, CO- 87 year old former Broncos wide receiver, Chris Cole, was found dead in his multi-million dollar Cherry Creek apartment on Sunday. "It really is a shame knowing that famous people who smash their head into the ground for millions of dollars each year are still mortal beings like the rest of us," said Broncos fan Jeremy King while crying into his Number 66, Chris Cole jersey. "I grew up watching Chris Cole, and never once did it cross my mind that he would die of totally natural causes. He was so big and beefy and loud, I always assumed he would get cancelled and fall off the face of the earth. Wait a second, are all of us going to die? Has anyone ever thought of this? If you think about it, and no one thinks the way I do, everyone dies. Everyone lives just to fall into eternal damnation. Then what's the point? If my favorite wide receiver - to which I pray to every night - can die in the same way as a doctor or civil rights leader or martyr then what is the point? Because even if you confront every single one of life's obstacles and become someone greater than anyone thought you could, like my favorite wide receiver, you are still met with a legitimate end. So what am I going to work for? Why do I pride myself on my incredible risotto making abilities? Why do I bother being faithful to my wife? So there's no point to any of this, we all are meant to rot in the ground." After crawling into a ball and rocking back and forth, Allen told reports he found it absurd the lack of coverage from other sources on Chris Cole's death considering he was an American hero and pretty okay receiver. He did not want to comment on the recent death of beloved scientist, Jane Goodall.
